

The Challenges Begin...

Weekly Report 2- 8/27 to 9/2

As this week began, the challenge of completing the first assessment of the year arose. This being the first assessment, we started by doing some research. With my topic being architecture, it meant that I could either have done a research assessment on a career outlook or the history of architecture. After quite some consideration, I decided that the history of architecture would be best as it can inform me of architectural design, structure, and even a little bit about the career itself.

Using Academic OneFile, I found an article that described architecture from the Neolithic era all the way to the modern era. However, when I began to look for the article, it was a challenge to find one that was not only recent, but also gave me the information about architecture history that I needed, but once I discovered this article, it was no longer a problem. With my goals this week being to learn more about the history of architecture and to take a lot of time to perfect my assessment, I feel as if I have accomplished all my goals.

Overall, the first assessment of the year was a challenge at first, however, after finding the perfect article that informed me of the history of architecture, I was able to learn and write an essay on the matter. Additionally, for next week, I hope to use the topic of architecture career outlook to complete the next assessment.
